Why You Shouldn't Sell Stocks in May – Even If You Go Away Barron's, Paul R LaMonica, April 30, 2024

There are many reasons to buy or sell stocks. The calendar is not one of them.

Yet here we are on the last day of April, and you are bound to hear people telling you it's time to sell in May and go away. Until October no less! Who takes a six-month vacation on Wall Street? But I digress. The question remains though: Should Investors unload stocks because of seasonal factors? NO

You can analyze corporate profits, valuations, the economic outlook and what's happening with interest rates to inform your portfolio decisions, for example. But the calendar should NOT determine whether you want to be fully invested or not.

Sure, market returns may be a bit lower over the late spring, summer, and early fall months. According to Dow Jones Market Data, the S&P 500 is up 4% on average during May through October over both the past five and 10-year periods. That compares to a 6% increase for the blue-chip index in November through April during the past five years and 5.5% average gain during the last 10 years.

So even though stocks haven't done well from May through October, they still tend to go up, proving that staying fully invested instead of trying to time the market is a more sensible strategy.

What's more, it's worth noting that this is a presidential election year. Stocks tend to perform slightly better during the months leading up to an election than they do in non-election years.

In other words, Detrick said the bottom line? Investors should probably take heed of another old saying: "Time in the market is better than timing the market."
